WHEN THE ROMANS arrived in Britain they built roads which, in many cases, form the basis of the modern network. Roman roads appear in fables and legends and have been the subject of great interest and much research for a hundred years or more.

But until recently the system in north-west Wales has been poorly understood, with many routes either disputed or completely unknown. David Hopewell’s new book is the result of a ten year project that has re-examined the evidence for all of the roads in the region, both on the ground and in the archives.

There have been many new discoveries, and a few surprises along the way.
